

Q1) In the previous Plays, our group conducted a mental health awareness session focused on teenagers, aligning with SDG-4: Quality Education. The aim was to educate young girls about emotional well-being, stress management, and the importance of seeking help.

We organized and planned the session collaboratively, deciding the content, format and method of delivery beforehand. Since our target audience was teenage girls, we ensured that content was simple, relatable and engaging. We included topics such as recognizing stress, dealing with academic pressures, and maintaining a healthy mindset.

To reach our audience, we shared an online session link with our neighbours' children, relatives and friends. At least 20 girls participated in the session, in which we presented key concepts, shared real life examples, and encouraged open discussion so participants felt comfortable sharing their thoughts.

Moreover, This activity benefitted the community by raising awareness about mental health, helping participants understand that their feelings are valid and that seeking help is important. For many, it was their first exposure to structured mental health education.

Overall, this experience helped improve our teamwork and communication skills while allowing us to contribute positively to the well-being of young individuals.

Q2) A critical incident during our activity occurred during the mental health awareness session, when one participant openly shared that she often feels stressed and overwhelmed due to academic pressure.

Initially, this created a moment of silence, as such topics are usually not discussed openly among teenagers. So we acknowledged her feelings and reassured her that such emotions are common and valid, encouraging a few other participants to also share similar experiences.

This incident was significant because it showed the real impact of our session. It transformed the environment from informational, to a safe space for discussion. It also highlighted how deeply mental health issues affect teenagers.

From a personal perspective, this moment taught me the importance of empathy, active listening, and responsible communication. I realised that our words and reactions can either encourage openness or shut it down completely.

Overall, this experience was both eye-opening and meaningful as it reinforced the importance of creating safe and supportive spaces for young individuals to express themselves.
